Although the U.S. Supreme Court struck legal restrictions on interracial intimacy almost fifty years ago, the law continues to influence our romantic choices today. The law helped to create the residential, social, and economic distance between racial and ethnic groups and continues to influence intimate preferences by drawing an artificial line between public and private discrimination. Our intimate choices, as influenced by law, perpetuate racial hierarchy and inequality in society.